Introduction

Once the appearance of the individual elements is determined, they must be arranged within the space in an appealing manner—one that encourages, if not compels, the viewer to see all that is there. The principles that govern arrangement of the elements in an ad are much the same as those that govern composition in fine art. While it is possible to find ads that defy one or more principles and still work well, they are few and far between.