Corey

1. In psychoanalytically based treatment, the therapist fosters a transference neurosis in the client. The transference process involves the client unconsciously shifting feelings and fantasies involving significant others in the client’s past onto the therapist. Once the transference neurosis occurs, how does the therapist help the client work through the relationship?