1. List three sentences that, when uttered, carry with them predictable implied meanings. Indicate what the implied meanings are and how they are generated.

   c.
2. In the following passage, identify the implied meanings associated with each of the three sentences (if any) and indicate how they are generated. Are there any implied meanings generated by the combination of sentences that are not generated by individual sentences?

   a. It's time for policymakers to address the criminal justice crisis head on. We must change the dismal status quo. We must start by asking a simple question: Why are so many Americans criminals? Look no further than Washington, which has spent the past century devising the most complicated — and nonsensical — criminal code known to man. … The list of federal crimes is so long, so broad and so vague that you and I likely commit three felonies every day, unwittingly breaking numerous federal laws as we go about our daily business. No wonder America's prison population is out of control. Americans aren't addicted to crime; our politicians are addicted to criminalizing things.
